Both late sleepers and early risers find the fixed hours of nine-to-five work day a problem. Now there is an answer that seems to please them both. Employees of over 500 businesses in the United States are changing their work hours to suit their individual needs. It's called "flexible time" (flextime) and it means, for example, that employees can start working at any time during the first three hours their office is open and leave after completing their required daily working time. Early risers can begin to work at seven a.m., finish at three and still have daylight time for shopping, picking up children at school, or recreation. Late sleepers need not report for work until 10 a.m.—but they must stay on their work until six in the evening.

People over the age of 65 are called senior citizens. Most senior citizens retire, or no longer work full time. Although some people of this age still live with their children and grandchildren, some grandparents, however, live in their own houses or apartments away from their families.

For many senior citizens, the years after 65 are not enjoyable. They feel unproductive when they no longer work. Their lives lose meaning. In addition, they may feel lonely being away from their families and contacts they had in their work. Moreover, they become more concerned with their health when they grow older. If they live in big cities, they often worry about their safety.

Other senior citizens enjoy their lives; they feel free to do the things they were not able to do when they were working and raising families. They now have time to enjoy hobbies, sports, and travel. They associate with their fellow senior citizens who have common interests and equal free time. Many senior citizens move to retirement communities located in warm climates. Some senior citizens continue to work beyond retirement age. Many find new careers and profession after they retire.

The number of senior citizens is increasing rapidly because people are living longer than before. The average life span is now more than 74 years. Because of their large numbers and more active life styles, senior citizens are gaining social influence in our society, both politically and economically. Their concerns are receiving a wider audience than ever before.
